Fine Lines is a national, quarterly, literary journal devoted to the publication of poetry, prose, and writing across the curriculum. The journal seeks:

- to provide insights for teachers and students in all disciplines.
- to encourage discussion of writing in ways that cut across disciplines, definitions, and traditions.
- to publish contributions by all members of the writing community.

Fine Lines receives creative writing and artwork from authors of all genres, ages, abilities, and occupations: prose articles of varying lengths, reflective essays on widely diverse topics that reflect life experiences, what one learns through the writing process, poetry in all forms, and mixed media. We have printed writing from a six-year-old, a 94-year-old great-grandmother, ministers, janitors, doctors, lawyers, scientists, teachers, an Indian chief, and students of all educational levels. Writers have been published from 85 countries around the world and counting!

We welcome articles on all topics of interest to our readers and reflective writing about interesting life experiences. Our editors encourage a broad variety of approaches, methodologies, and styles. We provide a forum for professional writers and first-time authors.
